Therapy Prince George - Developed in Switzerland during the latter part of the 1980s by Rolf Ott, Dynamic Spinal Therapy is a bodywork technique that combines hands-on body work and energy work in order to realign the spine, resolve spine and posture problems and address joint issues. It is always better to consult with a doctor previous to beginning any type of bodywork regime so as to make certain that there are no contraindications.

There are various practices and concepts included with Dynamic Spinal Therapy. This therapy borrows from Conventional Chinese Medicine the concept of qi or also called life force. A huge focus of Dynamic Spinal Therapy is the promotion of a healthy and even flow of qi all-around the body. It likewise relies on traditional Western styles like Swedish massage to adjust the body physically.

The standard Dynamic Spinal Treatment will last for just about 40 minutes and begin with an ear reflexology test. The points on the ear are tested and afterward the response is noted. The Dynamic Spinal Therapist then uses a particular stylus so as to trace the meridians of the body, looking for spots of weakness or blockages while following the flow of qi.

When the energy work session is done, the therapist makes adjustments to the spine and to the pelvis, first with the customer face up and next with the customer face down. The client is encouraged to relax deeply because the muscles are stretched intensely. The session is finished with a gentle rocking that is supposed to encourage the release of tension, and promote relaxation while realigning the spinal column. There are some therapists who skip the energy portion of the session and focus instead on the bodywork.

Customers would normally feel deeply relaxed right after a session of Dynamic Spinal Therapy has finished. With the vigorous stretching and added tension release, the body's posture is supposed to improve. At times conditions which cause soreness and back pain may be alleviated at least partially. Theoretically, regular sessions can keep the client's body and energy balanced, enhancing overall health and general well-being.
